MANY SUGGESTIONS IN

Governor Gardiner Interested in State Government Survey

State Government Survey

"I am very much interested in the report on the Survey of the State Government made for us by the National Institute of Public Administration."

While I have not had the opportunity of examining very thoroughly the entire report, the newspapers this coming week will carry summaries and abstracts of it and it is hoped the full business of it and it is hoped the full report will be printed and available for distribution by November 3rd. I hope that this report will receive the careful study of the members of the Legislature as well as of all citizens.

who are interested in governmental matters. It represents the most comprehensive document on the government of Maine that has ever been made. The report contains many an-arrangements for the improvement of the governmental agencies. Nothing can be more advantageous to the people of a State than to have an orderly, efficient and economical system of state government. Further study is necessary before expressing any opinion as to the suggestions contained in the report, but I am certain that it is comprehensive and timely.

The consideration of the problems of health and welfare very largely prompted me to have this study made.

The fundamental suggestions of the report that we adopt such changes as will bring more efficiency and economy in administrative matters and more coordination in our efforts for "It is most striking that as to many features of the report there is very little that is novel to Maine. It is interesting to note that this report carries along many of the suggestions rather tentatively advanced by the Cole Committee Report to the Legislature of 1923. As to many of the suggestions for improvement that are made, some progress has already been accomplished by past legislatures and State officials. Such accomplishment ment in many instances been only piecemeal. The opportunity is now presented for the study of a group of suggestions as to all affairs of government which may be considered contemporary.

Farm-Made Friendship

Henry Hicks was almost nine
And I was half past eight—
Had a double seat at school
And traded hooks and bait.
Used to say, when we grew up—
Wed never marry wives—
Buy a farm and live alone,
Together all our lives.

Human plans are fickle things
When taken of their best;
Hickses sold their farm one day
To move away out west.
Spent our last day on the creek
And at the pasture gate—
WELL,
Good-bye's hard for grownup folks—
But worse for mine and eight.

Life has brought me many friends
The wise, the short, the tall;
Still abides a friendly face
More precious than them all—
Just a freckled, friendly face
That seems to smile and say:
"Farm-made friendship is the best
And never fades away."

Society's Basic Belief

Christ's Second Coming

Shakers is the name of the religious society known as the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Coming. Its original belief included acceptance of the prophecy that Christ would return to earth, in the new birth, in the person of Ann Lee. In the coming millennium and in spiritualism. The origins were based in the manifestations of the French prophets in the Seventeenth century, a movement which spread to the Quakers in England. In 1770, Ann Lee joined the group, and although illiterate, soon became prominent. She was imprisoned, and while in durance had a vision directing emigration to America. She had a few followers who came to this country, settled in New York state, and founded other colonies of converts on the communistic plan. They have settlements in nine states. The name Shakers was early given to them on account of the members being affected with twitching in public meetings.

Nation Owes Vast Debt

to Sturdy Lumberman

Iberville and his husky French-Canadian lumbermen, threading the forests of the snowy North to Hudson's bay, cutting lumber on the tributary rivers, floating them to salt water, building a battle fleet, turning sailors and defeating the regular British fleet with their wilderness-made ships are historic figures of the lumberman in war. The axman, too, and the sawyers put Commodore Perry aloft on Lake Erie in a fleet made from trees in which the birds had been nesting only 50 days before Perry's cannon were proclaiming the mastery of Erie. Once again, in the great World war, the vocational descendants of the lumberman of a century ago launched a thousand sturdy ships of wood while the stumps of the fallen trees from which they came were still white and set with sap. Ten years later Admiral Byrd found that only a wooden ship could conquer the crowding ice of Antarctica.

Termites Not Ants

Termites, called white or ghost ants because of their paleness (the little white ants that are likely at any time to make a meal of almost anyone's home) are really not ants at all, but neuropteroid insects. They are by no means confined to tropical regions, some species inhabiting almost every state in the country. The native species, unlike tropical termites, does not construct huge mounds with a royal cell for the king and queen, but lives in comparatively large social colonies in burrows in earth or wood.

Beethoven's Unpaid Debt

How many people know that Beethoven actually died $500 in debt to the Pullman society, which had lent him the money on his death bed, in the hope that they would be able to play his Tenth Symphony? queried an article in the Montreal Family Herald. He acknowledged the debt some by telling them that his new symphony was lying in his desk "completely sketched." But the work was destined never to be finished. It was only eight days later that Beethoven died.

Most Difficult

Parson Tenthly and Deacon Dutton were discussing their automobiles and talk gradually took in every detail connected with automotive engineering. The conversation began with tires and ended with the beam of light cast a hundred feet up the road by the spotlight on the windshield. "What do you and the hardest thing to overcome when driving your car, Parson?" the deacon wanted to know. "The desire to talk back to my wife," the good man answered.

Many Ways of Keeping

Track of Passing Time

In the far-off days there were neither clocks nor watches by which the passing time might be measured. The sundial was the only instrument of service in this respect. It appears in the Bible, and was most likely invented by the Egyptians. The Romans were the masters of introducing it to the western nations of Europe. Before the Romans obtained knowledge of the instrument, however, they reckoned time by the dropping of water, much in the same way that we time an egg by a sand glass, and it was the duty of a slave to attend and make a sound at the recurrence of a certain number of drops.

Sundials by day and water droppers by night and in cloudy weather were the only means of measuring time. It is the monks of the Middle ages to whom we are indebted for the invention of timekeepers by wheels and other mechanism. The early instruments were very primitive affairs, but invention succeeded invention until we have today the most perfect and delicate instruments for telling time.

Many Eagerly Awaiting

Advent of Fool's Birth

In the train coming back from the English Derby a race course tipster commenced talking to John Corlett, famous editor of the Pink 'Un, and the old man listened for a while with interest, chuckles J. D. Booth in "Master and Man".

"But," he broke in finally, "how long have you been at the business?"

"Very nearly twenty years, governor!"

"Then," granted Corlett, "if there be any truth in what Thomas Carlyle tells us, that the population consists of so many millions, mostly fools, how is it that you have not made your fortune and retired long ago?"

The tipster snorted contemptuously. "I don't know 'oo this 'ere Carlyle is," he rasped, "but you can tell your friend Tom this for me. Tell 'im cheerful Charles says that for one foot as is born into this world, there's ten lookin' for 'im."—Kansas City Times.

A woman may have the greatest respect for old age. That is until it begins to tell on her.

It doesn't take footprints in the sands of time to prove that some of us are going backward.

"Hell is paved with good intentions," quoted the Wise Guy. "Yes, most of us have good intentions to burn," suggested the Simple Mug.

Harduppe—"That fellow Wigwag is always good for a touch. Anybody can get money out of him." Borrowwell—"That's right. Even his wife makes him cough up."

Muggins—"Talkatol positively refuses to join our society for the suppression of unnecessary noises." Bugins—"Naturally. Talkatol is too fond of the sound of his own voice."

Hemming Birds Kept Busy

Taking advantage of an opportunity to keep a single humming bird in view for a period of 25 minutes, Associate Professor Tracy I. Storer of the University of California department of zoology, found that even the supposedly careless, feathered folk have their troubles, and spend as much as 14 per cent of their time chasing after humming birds from their forage grounds.

He found that during a total of 1,121 seconds, or approximately 20 minutes, one humming bird spent 782 seconds, or more than 90 per cent of the time, in perching, 325 seconds in feeding, and 200 seconds in chasing invaders from its particular forage ground on a fuchsia bush.

HOW TO USE TRAVELERS' CHEQUES

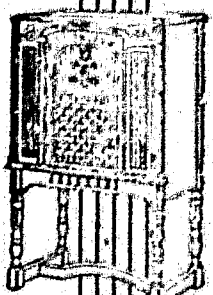

American Express Travelers' Cheques are as near an approach to "individual money" as the world has ever known. When you buy them you sign your name on the cheques. That makes them completely yours. When you wish to spend them you sign again in the presence of the one accepting them. This simple method of identification by signature is recognized all over the world. The second signature makes the cheques spendable. Until you have written this second identifying signature, however, no one else can use the Cheques. Because of this safeguard, if your Cheques are lost or stolen before you have countersigned them, or passed them for value, the American Express Company will refund their value to you.

Man's Faithful Friends

The patient, tolling back animals that lost their lives in the great Klondike gold rush have been honored by a memorial. Overlooking the grimly named "Dead-horse Gulch," at the junction point on the White Pass railroad, Alaska, there is a bronze tablet honoring the 3,000 animals that figured in the Klondike stampede. Paid for by old "sour-doughs," the tablet portrays a packhorse and mule on the trail. It has been estimated that the average life of a horse or mule used in gold rush packing was five weeks. The odds were against a longer span. The cold weather, one of the greatest hazards to all concerned, was probably of new experience for the animals, just as it was for the majority of miners. Great demands were made upon the animals and little care and food could be given in return. Often, just as in the Klondike rush, trails were marked by skeletons of the unfortunate animals. No war has been complete without horses and mules. The cavalry alone accounts for the horses, while hauling cannon, food and the indispensable water were part of the mule's job. In the War and Navy building in Washington is another bronze tablet, dedicated this time to the mules and horses—numbering nearly 250,000—which served with the A. E. F. in the World war.

Old Castle Garden Once

Famous Pleasure Resort

The old Castle Clinton, erected during the War of 1812, just west of Battery park, was renamed Castle garden and became a famous pleasure resort, says a writer in a New York paper. At first it was a little off shore, connected with the mainland by a drawbridge, but later the intervening space was filled in and it stood on the western edge of the park.

Here were held annual fairs, concerts, theatrical performances, operas and the circus. It filled much the same place in the life of the city as Madison Square garden did in after years. It was here, in 1850, that the famous singer, Jenny Lind, sang to enraptured audiences.

Part of its popularity as an amusement place was due to its location, in the city's largest park and at the water's edge; it was so charming to stroll in the romantic, gas-lit park before and after the performance. For since 1825 the lower part of New York city had enjoyed gas lights, a brilliant improvement over the flickering oil lanterns of an earlier day.

Odd Cannon Proved Failure

On the public square at Athens, Ga., stands the only double-barreled cannon in existence, a weapon built by an inventor with Confederate sympathies during the Civil war, says an article in Popular Mechanics Magazine. The inventor made the weapon with the idea of connecting two cannon barrels with a long chain and firing them simultaneously. The balls, it was reasoned, would travel in parallel courses and mow down everything in front of them with the connecting chain, inflicting wholesale slaughter.

The scheme came to grief when it was found that it was impossible to fire both balls at the same rate of speed. The one going the faster simply dragged the other behind by the chain, and the weapon proved no more destructive than the single-barreled kind then in use; so only the one was built.

Indians' Use of Tobacco

Students of ethnology differ as to whether the pre-Columbian Indians ever smoked merely for personal enjoyment, says an article in Pathfinder Magazine. There is very little if any evidence to justify the common belief that the Indians of pre-Columbian days smoked habitually and privately merely for personal enjoyment.

To the Indians the tobacco plant had a sacred character and was smoked on solemn occasions, with suitable invocations to their deities. It also was smoked ceremoniously to cure disease, and in distress, ward off danger, bring good luck, and to ally fear. In this respect the smoking tobacco and other materials somewhat resembled the burning of incense among other peoples.

Might Be Dangerous

A very well-dressed and pretty girl applied for a position as typist to a London business house.

"Where were you last employed?" asked the senior partner of the firm. "In a doll factory," the girl replied. "A doll factory?" echoed the other. "And what were your duties?"

"I was making eyes for three years," she coyly answered.

The senior partner raised thoughtfully at the girl. "All right, you're engaged," he said, after a while. And then, dropping his voice somewhat, he added: "By the way, don't demonstrate your abilities when my wife is in the office."—London Answers.

Fragrant Pine Pillows

To make pine cushions, gather the new growth of the balsam fir, cut into small pieces and spread out to dry for a few days. Add to the green a few of the white flowers of the everlasting weed. The flowers will give elasticity and lightness to the cushion and help to retain the fragrance. Fill into cotton cushion and cover with a fancy outer case. A good cushion should last for a number of years and on a damp day or when shaken up at any time, emit a delightful woodland odor.

The Handsome Man

MARGARET TURNBULL

IRWIN MYERS

CHAPTER I.—Returning to London, practically penniless, after an unsuccessful business trip to South America, young Sir George Sanderson takes dinner with his widowed stepmother, his old nurse, Aggie. He has not approved of her marriage to his father, but she makes an explanation that satisfies him. There is little left of the estate, and Lady Sanderson promises to go to the United States to visit her brother, Robert MacBeth, a wealthy contractor. With no prospects in England, Sir George agrees.

CHAPTER II.—With his young daughter, Roberta, MacBeth is living on his estate, an island. The girl longs for city life, and is dissatisfied. MacBeth is a victim of arthritis and almost physically helpless. Leaving her father after an interchange of words, Roberta meets Lady Sanderson and Sir George, and assumes they are the new cook and butler, who had been expected. She directs them to the house, realizing with some surprise that the man is the handsome she has ever seen.

CHAPTER III.—MacBeth, when apprised of his sister's coming, or of her marriage, but he is glad to see her and invites the two to stay. Roberta is keeping a "date" with a young man, Jack Navarro, about whom she knows little, though she thinks she is in love with him. MacBeth arranges that Lady Sanderson take charge of the household, at a salary, and Sir George act as his secretary. Roberta is told of the arrangement and is not cordial.

CHAPTER IV.—Roberta tells her father she is "not interested" in Sir George, while the young man takes an attitude of complete indifference to her antagonism. An anonymous letter from Mrs. MacBeth to his daughter, revealing the matter but admitting he was over the safe conveyance of a pay roll for a big viaduct he is building. It is arranged that Roberta drive Sir George to a bank in a nearby village, where he is to be introduced to the manager and next day take the pay roll to the workers. Sir George sees Roberta with Navarro and recognizes him as the adventurer type, is alarmed for the girl's welfare.

CHAPTER V.—In Philadelphia, a gathering of "business men" of which Navarro is one, discusses the possibility of stealing the pay roll, which has all along been Navarro's objective. The matter is left to him. Roberta takes Sir George to the bank and later introduces him to her circle. She arranges for a dinner and dance in his honor, for the following Saturday.

CHAPTER VI.—The girl drives Sir George to the construction camp, where he meets young Ray Browne, an engineer in charge. She leaves them while they talk business, returning slightly wounded in the hand, having been "winged" by some one rabbit shooting. Sir George's hat and hatband had been in the car, clearly visible, and the young Scotman is satisfied the shots were meant for him. The girl says she only had a mere glimpse of the man who did the shooting. MacBeth is more uneasy.

CHAPTER VII.—During the dance Sir George sees Navarro, outside the house, evidently waiting for Roberta. He tells the girl, "Remember what she calls his 'interference'—she has a hurtful mouthing with Navarro. While talking with MacBeth, Sir George pounces through an open window, apparently in pursuit of some one.

"Alta! I wish me a cigarette. Don't you like the boys here?" MacBeth asked as the younger man rose to get the cigarettes.

"Oh, immensely! Only they seem very young to me," said Sir George, as he discovered that the matches were not with the cigarettes, but on a stand near the window, and moved to get them.

Robert MacBeth opened his lips to tell him that Ray Browne and others had been in France during the war and were fully as old if not older than Sir George, when he remembered that the boys who went over from here, though they fought and suffered as bravely as any there had at least come home to a land of settled peace and plenty, which had not been Sir George's case. He was about to put something of this in words, when to his amazement the cigarettes were dashed on the desk and Sir George, with a quick low exclamation went clanging through the window and along the terrace, in rapid pursuit of some one or something.

CHAPTER VIII

Some one had been listening at the window. Though he hung himself so he could see into the parlor that he was still carrying in his hand a box of matches and the single cigarette which he had taken out of the box for MacBeth, Sir George was not in time to see his quarry round the corner. He lunged the matches and cigarette from him, and leaped over the edge of the terrace and went toward the little landing place, where he could see a man getting into one of the canoes. He had every reason to believe that in a moment he would have him in his grasp when Roberta MacBeth rose suddenly, it seemed to him out of the earth, though it was really only from behind the shrubbery near the landing place, and blocked his way. He flung out his hand, to keep from falling himself or knocking her down, and grasped her shoulders. He spun her out of the way, disregarding her gasp of, "What's wrong?"

But the delay had been sufficient. There was no sign of the man he had been pursuing, and when he reached the water's edge there was no one there. Mechanically he began searching for some hiding place among the boats, when Roberta joined him. She was alone and breathless, and both facts made Sir George suspicious.

"What happened?" she asked him abruptly.

He answered her with equal abruptness. "You have just prevented my capturing some one who was watching, or listening, under your father's window."

She gave him a quick startled look, and then raising her voice a "little higher, whether with intent of astonishment he could not be quite sure.

"What things you imagine. How could he have come this way without my seeing him?"

Sir George did not answer. He went down to the water's edge and then started toward the bridge which lay in shadow. Instantly this provoking girl was in front of him again.

"I asked you—"

In the heat of his anger at her persistence he answered her as he would not have done if he had stopped to think for a moment. "Some friend of yours, evidently, since you are so anxious to screen him."

She stepped back as though he had struck her.

"Do you mean—," she began.

"I don't mean anything," he answered, avoiding her. "I would like to continue my search alone. Go back to your guests, or go back to your father, and explain to him why you blocked my way."

He had twisted from her now. If she had wished to stop him she could not. He ran, with the quick swiftness which his long legs made possible, across the little bridge and up the road that led to the highway. The road he had found before him was quite empty.

He waited a moment, his senses alert, for any movement in the brush but there was none. Not a sound, so far as he could hear. He went slowly back to meet, as he crossed the bridge, various riotous greetings and questions as to where and when he had lost his girl. He replied to them in the same jesting tone, relieved that he had not been seen running along the terrace, and that no one had been alarmed.

Robert MacBeth gave him a quick inquiring look. He answered it with a little warning frown.

Lady Sanderson went toward the door with some of Robert's guests, saying in a low voice to her stepson, as she passed him: "Dance with Roberta, lad."

MacBeth, father, and let his dreams come true.

"Who told you about it?" MacBeth looked from one to the other.

"Oh, Sir George, of course," Roberta laughed. "I met him when he was hot on his wild goose chase."

MacBeth stared. "Did you? He didn't tell me that. What were you doing when you stopped him?"

"Nothing," said Roberta, and bit her lip. "What a fool she was! Sir George would be certain to fasten all his silly suspicions upon Jack! How easy it would have been to have said she was looking at the gutter or waiting for her dance partner."

But her father had her answer now and was studying it over. She was sure that he was not satisfied, though he said in a level voice to both of them, "Well, tomorrow or today, rather, will tell me what we know now. Good-morning, children. Here comes August."

The secretary walked toward the dining room door, and after a moment Roberta joined him. She did not speak until Sir George moved toward the stairway.

"Decent of you not to tell. But you see it wasn't necessary."

"I am sorry you spoke."

"Why?" she challenged him.

He shook his head. "Just have an idea that it is the last straw—to your father. I don't think he will sleep tonight."

"How about you?"

"Oh, I won't sleep, either. I'm going up to get a glass, or, as it's American, maybe a revolver, and watch the door."

Roberta laughed. "How melodramatic and how unreal! Look out of this soft countryside, still and quiet. What could happen between now and daylight?"

"Nothing," Sir George said unconcerningly, and turned to leave her.

"Or anything?" Roberta called after him, challengingly—and when she saw him safely up the stairs she went swiftly out to the landing place. If she could only get there and tell Jack to go away before Sir George came out again on the terrace!

Jack, looking his picturesque best in the moonlight on the tiny beach, was not so easy to send away. He had something to find out before he went, and something to tell the girl which would make his own position stronger.

It took him some moments and much tact to get the information. When he knew at last that tomorrow MacBeth had planned to send his secretary to the bank, he reluctantly released the nervous girl after a burst of furious jealousy, which terrified Roberta.

Vehemently he had told her that it was because of her father's other guest—the cursed Englishman—that he had refused to come to the dance tonight. To meet Sir George was to denounce him publicly as a scoundrel. Then had followed a long bitter tale of Sir George's meeting with, conquest and destruction of a certain Seneca McGroves.

What Roberta finally gathered, was that Sir George had met this Seneca McGroves on the steamer, bound for New York, and he had been singled out and as a consequence thrown overboard when he found how he was money.

The tale was so carefully told, it made Sir George's own cheap index get somehow to the story and the story itself.

Roberta was glad when Jack Navarro finally padded noiselessly away. She was heartily roused at him, and Sir George, at the whole world, and she was half sick with lack of sleep, fatigue and the fear that Sir George might find her.

The girls were glad to hear, as they discovered that her father and his secretary were on the other side of the terrace, glancing and talking, and would never do this again for Jack or any other man, Roberta except his status.

"What's wrong with you, lad?" MacBeth asked sharply. "The last time you said had to sense."

"I beg pardon," his secretary turned from the window. "I forced for a moment, because," he hesitated, because I am trying to put a scheme—words that will make you see how feasible it is."

"Well, let me have it and I'll sort out the wheat from the chaff."

The secretary looked at his chief with a cool eye. "It's almost all wheat," he drew a long breath and sat down beside MacBeth's chair. "The men you have reason to fear are after the payroll will be looking for two things: First, that the cash will travel from New York and pass through long stretches of lonely country in Jersey, before it crosses the river here."

MacBeth nodded.

"Second, they will have gotten used, through some source, of the fact that you have an account at the local bank, and although it may be given out that it's merely a house bank account, they will have the means. If so, they will be looking for a car coming from the hotel in the village to the construction camp."

Again MacBeth nodded. "Well," he said, "sense so far. What's your plan?"

"You will not be exposing any of your men," Sir George said hastily. "I wouldn't for a moment propose that. It would be well worth the expense of the armed car, sir, if we notified the state police and they caught some of the rascals."

"But you? It is of you I was thinking."

The younger man laughed. "Who would believe that Beauty Sanderson was doing anything but strolling along to meet a girl? Or if they met me higher up the river, I am, of course, looking in the British passport for walking."

"The river road or the towpath?"

"The towpath, of course."

"But has long lonely stretches."

"Yes, but they can't be traveled by motor. Their motor would have to be left on the road."

MacBeth looked at him jealously. "It's what I would like to do myself. But thinking of Aggy—I hesitate to allow you to—"

Aggy's stepson frowned. "Of course, Aggy isn't to know; that would be fatal. Roberta's not to know, either. She's not to know even the smallest detail if it's to be a successful trip."

"What do you mean?" MacBeth asked.

"What I said," and Sir George forgot his customary respectful attitude and unconsciously assumed a domineering tone. "Nothing can or will be done unless both of the women in this house are absolutely ignorant of what is going on, and especially your daughter."

MacBeth lay back on his pillow and surveyed the determined young face. The young fellow thinks Roberta will not be excited about him, he thought.

About he said, "Roberta's not the girl to get excited about her father's schemes."

"Perhaps not," said his secretary, gently, "but she's not to know for more reasons than one. Not to be model as he saw MacBeth's eyes, son, that the girl herself may not be so sure of her legal and trustworthy, but, and he said it with due emphasis, 'I am not trusting some of her quality companions.'

MacBeth found he could not get anything more from him then and finally gave it up.

"Mind, I don't agree with you about Roberta," he said emphatically. "She's high-strung and determined, but she's my girl and I know I can trust her."

"That may be, but after all she is young, and she picks her friends rather carelessly to my way of thinking. Is it on, with Roberta in the dark completely? Or is it off, and you tell the girl the whole scheme?"

MacBeth thought awhile, and then held out his hand. "It's a good deal less likely, workable scheme, so well say it's on and all females beware!"

"Done!" said Sir George. "Ray Browne will meet me half way, and I'll get the money up there or I'll find the cash."

CHAPTER IX

The sun shone brightly on the towpath as Sir George crossed the bridge on his way to the bank. He had the small car Robert's uncle drove, and had refused, apparently, Sir George's invitation to join him separately.

"No thanks," he had said, "I have things to do that I don't want to do anything but what I want to do. Nothing more exciting at the bank and the bank and the bank."

He looked at her tranquilly, he knew that Roberta's presence had not hurt a decent cause, but he was sure that she was not a girl to be trusted.

him, Sir George went into the bank. He had seen nothing unusual when he entered. Two cars only were parked in front of the bank. When he went inside, business was going on as usual. He went directly to the bank manager's room. It was divided off from the front and the rest of the bank offices by a partition of wood and glass. The upper part of this partition did not reach all the way up to the old-fashioned ceiling. It was only about eight feet high.
